The Perks of Chamber Membership for Young Professionals

Chamber Event Ideas for Young Professionals

Successfully Building a Young Professional Member Base
Resume Diversity
Chambers offer members the opportunity to include substantive elements in their resumes. Leadership roles, community awards, and committee volunteerism are all examples of experience that help build professional credibility.

Exclusive Information
Members have the ability to quickly access data such as legislative policy updates, original research, innovative trends, regional predictions, articles from thought leaders, proprietary content, seminars, newsletters, and best practices.

Job Searches
Many chambers provide access to job opportunities. Online job boards, career centers, job fairs, and exclusive openings are common benefits.

Leadership Skills
Members can participate in programs that help them become a recognized community leader. From the smallest engagement (answering questions at an event) to major participation (speaking at a legislative session), taking advantage of any opportunity helps with professional development.

Reputations Building
Chambers help members create a name for themselves. Membership builds credibility, indicates a commitment to the community, signals appreciation for professional standards, and assures knowledge of area trends and developments.

Benefits & Discounts
Members often qualify for benefits and discounts. These may include savings on products and services, group health care, travel discounts, and access to mentoring programs, young professional groups, exclusive conferences, trade shows, and events.

Training & Education
Education paves the road to success in any industry. Chambers host workshops, online training, peer-to-peer learning, etc., designed to help members develop professionally.

Strength in Numbers
Chambers provide the benefits of political clout without the pressure. They work tirelessly to influence legislation by shaping policy and regulation decisions, swaying public opinion, and lobbying, all in an effort to further the goals and ideals of the community they represent.

Giving Back
Chambers provide endless opportunities for volunteerism on all levels. Whether it’s participating within the chamber itself or helping out other charitable organizations, members can easily find ways to give back.

Networking
Members make meaningful connections through chambers. There are LinkedIn groups, private online chamber networks, exclusive access to membership directories, exposure to thought leaders and influencers, and endless programs and events.
Our recent industry survey revealed a number of trends impacting the chamber industry. There were numerous responses specifically about the challenge of engaging young professionals. Results showed that regardless of size, budget, or mission, most chambers are struggling to come up with ideas to engage 20-somethings.

While there is not a singular answer to the challenge, even the simplest of ideas are worth trying, right?

8 FUN IDEAS FOR 20-SOMETHINGS:

1. Group dinner featuring local breweries
2. Personal growth seminar using Clifton Strengths-Finder program
3. Poker Tournament with play money but real prizes
   - Sky-diving simulator
   - Bingo – cheesy but fun
   - Virtual horse racing or home run derby
   - Performance bartending (Google it)
   - Giant “Operation” or “Light Bright” games

Tip: It's important to view engagement activities for young professionals as an investment, not a revenue generator. Consider your best possible scenario to be a break-even, and you'll be on the right track.
The Customer Wants What the Customer Wants: How Chambers Can Successfully Build a Young Professional Member Base

Regardless of its mission or structure, a chamber’s day-to-day operations essentially mirror that of a service-based business. Businesses have customers. Chambers have members. Why do customers seek goods and services? To solve a problem. Why do members engage with an organization? To solve a problem.

Consider the “member as the customer” angle as it relates to younger members. With the influx of Millennials and Generation Z into the workforce, it’s time for chambers to accept that a new type of “customer” has emerged and they’re here to stay.

A Google search for “what millennials want” produces thousands of results focused on this generation’s expectations of employers, restaurants, banks, hotels, cars, etc. The takeaway? They’re not willing to adapt to business, so businesses must adapt to them.

Perhaps the most succinct and profound search result was a LinkedIn article about the evolution of athletic footwear marketing. No, chambers aren’t shoe companies, but both are facing the same challenge: how to resonate with the younger generation.

“The Millennial generation isn’t interested in the pressure and expectations associated with professional sports,” posted Brent James of Concept 21, a footwear industry leader. “They have seen through the advertising and the hype, realizing that they are merely being sold a false dream. This is why new demand for a more relatable brand is being filled by smaller companies... millennials want a brand that motivates, guides and connects them through experiences.”

What business is designed, at its very core, to motivate, guide and provide experiences? Chambers.

Chambers have the resources to provide young professionals exactly what they want (the “business” has what the “customer” needs). The key is to have a plan to make those resources widely available and ensure your target demographic is aware of them.

The good news is your plan is already in action. You’ve established a goal (recruit and engage younger members) and pinpointed what you need to provide to achieve that goal: Motivation, Guidance, and Experiences.

NEXT STEPS:

Convene a team: Identify key players. Input and perspective from a variety of sources is ideal - consider including the board, staff, members, and non-members.

Assess: Convene the group to establish a focus on what young professionals are looking for from a chamber. Set a formal objective (e.g., increase young membership recruitments by 10%).

Analyze: As a group, identify links between what they want and what your organization offers, or could offer (e.g., online education, mentoring, chat groups, etc.). Don’t overthink it; nothing is too absurd. The more ideas, the better – the group is less likely to dial in on one idea too soon. Working through this step with the “wants” (motivation, guidance, and experiences) top of mind will help with the next step.

Inc.com suggests creating an “idea resume” to put ideas into action: “An idea resume is a one-page document listing the following attributes: how customers will learn about it or access it; what resources or processes are needed to make it a reality; and how the solution will achieve the objective.”

“The benefit of idea resumes is that (when they’re finished) they allow all involved parties to scan and share ideas in a way that invites "apples-to-apples" comparisons and "ensures that ideas are evaluated on their merits rather than on how well they are pitched."

At this point, determine the feasibility of ideas and decide/recommend concepts, then narrow down the selection to those that are most promising.

Create a concept map: Establish a basic road map for transforming the ideas into components of a program. It doesn’t need to be complicated, but be sure to keep a laser-tight focus from beginning to end. The map can be updated in perpetuity, but a visual representation of the plan is helpful for everyone to stay on target.

Create an action plan: Plan the implementation of your new and improved program/process for recruiting and retaining younger members. The action plan builds on the concept map and should consist of the tasks required for each step of the launch. Whether it’s lining up education courses, planning a mentorship program, putting together a networking event, there should be tasks for each.

Launch: Using the action plan, kick off your new and improved program. Monitoring and managing are key aspects to keeping things on target. This cannot be overemphasized – monitoring and mentoring will make or break your program.

Evaluate: This should be ongoing. Are you on track to reach the goal? Where can the process be improved? Ask for frank feedback on what’s working and what can be improved or should be pushed to the side. Regardless of the results of the evaluation, chambers should go back through earlier steps to rework or fine tune. No program is perfect, and all programs are in a state of constant evolution. The key to making it work is to be willing to adjust the sails as you navigate the waters.

Competition for members is fierce and meeting the demands of this young demographic is critical to survival. To stay credible and relevant, chambers must provide what they want.

In her book, “Save the Associations,” Sarah Sladek of XYZ University shares a quote from Mary Detloff of the Minnesota Society of Professional Engineers, “Now people are interested in an association more so because of what it can do for them, not what they can do for the association or the profession.”

This generation isn’t going away. Whether or not associations are going away depends on their willingness to adapt to 20- and 30-somethings. The sky’s the limit, so try something new.
